ABSTRACT

The main objective of this research was to study the learning process about sex Education and AIDS. The experimental instrument was participatory learning process. The data collection instruments were informal interviews, participatory and non-participatory observation forms, pre-test and post-test after joining the activity.

The findings revealed that the participatory learning process enabled the samples to learn and realize the importance of communication about sex, have good attitude towards sex, interact and build relationships and evaluate an option on risky situations. Moreover, the result of the test of knowing real sex and safe behavior before and after sex was significantly different.
